Job Titles for Speech Communications Majors

Many graduates in Speech Communication pursue graduate work in their emphases. They are also afforded a variety of career options in education, government, business and industry, and broadcasting. Graduates specializing in communication theory and organizational communication often find satisfying careers in communication consulting / training and conference planning. Graduates with an emphasis in public address and rhetoric often achieve success in law, industrial and organizational communication, educational administration, public relations, speech writing and theology. The teacher education emphasis prepares graduates for careers in teaching. The emphasis in communication disorders provides a solid background for students pursuing careers in education, health care (i.e., schools, community clinics, hospitals), and vocational rehabilitation. The broadcasting / telecommunication emphasis prepares students for careers in radio, television, cable, public affairs, sales and marketing, advertising, management, production and engineering. Theater careers are open to graduates with specialties in stagecraft, sound, engineering, script-writing, directing, and acting. For information about these and other careers, please go to www.onetonline.org/.
